Diploma in Management Consultancy

About this qualification

The Diploma in Management Consultancy is awarded on the successful completion of five modules of training consisting of a blend of face to face training, coaching and guided self study. Each module is standalone and you can accumulate credits on the successful completion of each one; in total the Diploma needs 240 hours of work, but you can spread this over a period of time to suit your own timetable.

What do the modules cover?

Introduction to the Diploma: this is taken only by those wishing to take the Diploma and cover professional practice and professional development. The courses associated with all the other modules can be taken without the need to enter the Diploma.

Organisational behaviour and dynamics covers features of internal and external operating environments; handling organisational change; working with clients and their organisation; understanding group dynamics; developing high impact teams and working effectively with groups.

Developing consulting insight helps you understand clients and their predicaments. It covers the “hard” analytical skills needed to sell and deliver consulting projects and so deals with the research, analysis and tools and techniques needed to create effective working relationships, establish client needs, develop proposal content and contractual terms of engagement, and create deliverables.

Compelling communication covers productive working relationships, personal impact, communication methods and presenting with impact.

Engagement management reviews different consulting models, identifying effective intervention management strategies, project strategy and lifecycle and project.
